Balázs Trencsényi (Department of History, CEU) in dialogue with Aurelian Craiutu (Political Science, IU) on Trencsényi’s recent book:

A History of Modern Political Thought in East Central Europe: Volume I: Negotiating Modernity in the ‘Long Nineteenth Century’

Thursday, February 22, 2018
12:00–1:00 p.m.
Global & International Studies Bldg., GA2067

The outcome of a joint eight-year collaborative effort led by a core international team coordinated by Balázs Trencsényi, a professor of history at CEU Budapest, and assisted by a broader circle of international experts with local knowledge, this is undoubtedly one of the most important, ambitious, and original books in intellectual history and comparative political thought published in the last few decades. It provides a much-needed overview of the history of political thought in East and Central Europe. Volume I of A History of Modern Political Thought in East Central Europe (Oxford, 2016) arrives at a good moment as we are trying to rethink the European intellectual heritage and find a new identity for the enlarged European Union. The book focuses on negotiating the meanings of modernity in what the authors call “the long nineteenth century” that ended with the Great War that began in 1914. The book demonstrates how East Central European thinkers created new and distinctive ways of thinking about history, society, culture, and politics that sought to build bridges between several different worlds, such as Western and Eastern Europe, Catholicism, Protestantism, Orthodox Christianity, and the Muslim parts of Southeast Europe.

Balázs Trencsényi is associate professor at the Department of History, Central European University Budapest. His research focuses on the comparative history of political thought in East Central Europe and the history of historiography (website).
